Dont's for Gunners

Every year the hunting season brings with it its spoils in the form of human sacrifices. For the benefit of gunners who are going after game this fall, the following list of dont's is given:

Don't take any chance. The function of a shotgun is to scatter shot, but be very careful where you scatter it.

Don't blaze away in haste and don't get excited. Many a shooter has filled his favorite dog full of lead just because he was over anxious.

Don't point a gun at any person in jest. It is always the gun that "we didn't know was loaded" that goes off and does the damage. The only time to point a gun is when you intend to kill.

Don't take every rustle of a bush or a bough to be a sure indication of game. Remember sometimes an inquisitive person has a penchant for being in strange places.

Don't carry a loaded gun through the streets or in cars, trains, automobiles or any kind of vehicle, or leave it around farm houses to have some child playfully blow a head off.

Don't get excited and shoot without making sure your object is game. Don't shoot until you see the rabbit, or whatever it may be and then be sure that he is clear of both man and dog.

Democratic women of eight counties of New York met in Buffalo, October 20, for conference. Mrs. John Sherwin Crosby, member of the Associate National Committee of the Democratic National Committee, greeted the women in the name of the State Democratic Committee and W. W. Farley, State chairman, made an address. Five minute talks by the county chairman of the eight judicial district were a feature of the program.

A Russell Riot!

That "everything in life is more or less of a gamble" is fairly well substantiated in "All the World to Nothing," the William Russell feature which will appear at the Star Theatre on the Friday Nov. 21. It opens with a three-night poker game where Richard Chester gambles away a fortune.

The next venture is where he marries to save himself from arrest, and becomes the husband of an heiress whom he has never seen before and whose fortune will be of no benefit to him.

Then the game of chance is continued at the "Mecca of speculation," the Stock Exchange, and the fluctuating status of Brazilian lead shares sways the fate of those interested.

William Russell "bumps the bumps" of misfortune and fortune, but the narrative winds up with Dame Fortune not only smiling upon him, but fairly smothering him with her attentions; and so does, finally, the heroine

A town always prospers best when the people are all united to help one another. When merchants are willing to live and let live; when every business man shows his faith in the city or town in which he lives by sticking to and helping all in his power legitimate enterprises in the town, and following the invariable rule of getting everything he needs at home, even though he can temporarily do better elsewhere. There is the greatest possible strength in union of sentiment and union of action. If there is any circumstance in the world where reciprocity is valuable it is at home. The merchant is dependant on the farmer, the farmer upon the merchant and mechanic. There is no such thing as success without co-operation and where this exists there is the greatest prosperity.

City Men on Farms

Many city business men cherish the dream of some day owning a farm. A lot of them try it. Some of them make good. The majority find conditions different from what they expected and get tired of it.

Any man who has brains and will work can make a living at farming. The main question is whether he really likes country life or not. The country towns welcome the coming of city people with their brightness and experience of business. But they hate to see people take up a line of work that they don't understand and in which they consequently make a failure. The city man who contemplates owning a farm would often do better to lease one for a year and try it out.

Two Spots

So far the 14 hour day farmers haven't squeezed out many tears of sympathy for the striking miners who demand a five day week and six hour day.

The fact that a boy can play a 15 inning game of baseball does not prove that he can walk a mile to the schoolhouse without being transported.

The towns that don't believe in advertising, are about the same ones that are very widely advertised by the cussing of the motorists about their bad roads.

3 Acres and a Cow

Some years ago one of Joseph Chamberlain's lieutenants in the British Parliament enunciated the belief that every male inhabitant in the United Kingdom was entitled to three acres and a cow.

The saying created much ridicule from those who have, and considerable mutterings from those who have not. But in principle it was a true saying; it is an old saying; it is the fundamental basis of all material prosperity.

Years before that the Incas in ancient Peru were saying that every citizen must have his piece of land and must produce his subsistence from it.

Years before that in Europe the tribes, ancestors of the present nationalities, were basing their group-politics on individual land holdings.

Years before that and in a time so dim that history is only a vague chronicle, each man was required to develop and hold a piece of land.

Three acres and a cow! Not literal, of course. One man wants only one acre, another five; one man wants chickens, not cows, another neither. But the principle is undeniable, from the recorded time of man to this day; that each man should have his figurative "three acres and a cow" wherewith to contribute something, at least, to the subsistence of himself and his.

All men cannot make bread, for the world's industries demand labor; all men cannot make machines, for the world's children demand bread; but each man can and should have the plot of ground whereon he alone is master, from the bowels of the earth to the heavens above him, as the symbol of his citizenship, the visible badge of his independence and the birthright of his labor.
